

Sam Park has written a tender and witty love story, and in so doing has rescued an important time in our collective history from oblivion. A touching and engaging novel which effortlessly captures the joy and pain of one's first love affair, and that moment in life when we all must decide whose life to live: ours or the one others have chosen for us. -- Don Roos, writer-director, "The Opposite of Sex," "Happy Endings" "An intense literary love story: elegant, urgent, and wonderfully romantic." --Sarah Waters, author "The Night Watch" A paean to youth, love, longing, and literature, Shakespeares Sonnets is evocative and bittersweet.--Curtis Sittenfeld, New York Times bestselling author of "Prep" A poignant, provocative tale about the longings, conflicts and risks of first love in an era that condemns it... Parks writing exudes the authority of a scholar and the sensitivity of an artist, propelled by the searing force of truth, and signals the arrival of a bold new talent on the literary scene. - Barry Sandler, screenwriter, "Making Love" Are Adam and Jean in 1948 living out Shakespeares story? Or Wildes? Or ours? A masterful story-teller, Sam Park put history, as well as us, in a state of suspense.--Bruce R. Smith, author of "Homosexual Desire in Shakespeares England" First developed as a one-act play at Stanford University, this literate, intimate novel introduces a fresh new voice in gay fiction. The time is 1948. Adam Greenhurst is a student at Harvard with dreams of becoming a literary scholar. He's from a rich and influential family and has become engaged to the perfect girl. His life plan is set, until he's busted by campus police for having sex with another man in a public place. Threatened with expulsion, Adam refocuses his energies on a new class about Shakespeare's sonnets. There he meets Jean Hoffman, a man with whom Adam shares much: love of language and love of men. As their relationship grows, Adam realizes he will have to make a choice: the life his family planned for him, or the life his heart wants.
