It follows, therefore, that when the South is prosperous it furnishes a good market for corn, flour, meat, and dairy products, and that a prosperous North makes a good demand for cotton and cotton products. World Production. Such a large part of the cotton crop is marketed abroad that the prosperity of the South also depends to a considerable extent upon the conditions of the foreign markets for cotton. It is important, therefore, to consider the world's supply of and demand for cotton. The United States has been for many years the world's greatest cotton producer. India, China, Egypt, and Brazil are the most important competitive producers. Many other countries produce small amounts of cotton. (See Figs. 2 and 3.) India. Some cotton is grown in nearly all parts of India, but most of it grows in the western half of the country. As in the United States, there is a high degree of specialization in cotton. From 1891 to 1914 the cotton crops of Egypt, India, and the United States nearly doubled. The total crop of 1914 was the largest ever produced. Last year the crops in Egypt and the United States were the smallest in many years. Cotton growing in some districts. The area devoted to cotton in India equals about two-thirds of the area planted in the United States, but the low yields per acre return a total crop about one-third as large. The production of India varies considerably from year to year, with a tendency to increase. The crop of 1919 was the largest yet produced. (See Fig. 2.) Egypt. The cultivable land in Egypt is limited to the Delta and a narrow strip along the Nile, of which nearly one-third is in cotton. The acreage is only about one-twentieth that of the United States, but large yields return a crop about one-tenth as large.
